complex that stretched nearly four miles along the Susquehanna River near the state's capital of Harrisburg. Immigrants from all over Europe, particularly Slavs and Italians, worked with African Americans from the South at the Bethlehem Steel Company and gave Steelton its reputation for ethnic diversity, second only to its fame for industrial productivity. Catholics, Protestants, and Jews fill the area. About the Author: Michael Barton and Simon J. Bronner are professors of American studies at the Pennsylvania State University at Harrisburg. The book's images come mainly from the John Yetter Collection of photographs at the Center for Pennsylvania Culture.
